The climate debate between Europe and India is stuck, with official positions limited by how far governments are willing to go in light of UNFCCC negotiations. Both the EU and India are falling far short of their potential. If we are to respond to the climate challenge effectively, fresh thinking is urgently needed.

This event kicks off a series of seminars in India and Europe, designed to ask hard questions of why the partnership is not working and what needs to be done to reinvigorate it. Across the EU and India new voices are emerging in response to the perceived failure of governments to deliver on climate change. This seminar series will bring many of them together to build new coalitions for action and work with governments to move official positions on.

The series will culminate with a set of recommendations feeding into the EU-India Summit in Marseille on 29 Sept 2008.
